

DELIMITATION IN INDIA

Understanding why India's next delimitation exercise could reshape political representation across the country.

Two Indian states with similar populations today may have very different numbers of Members of Parliament not because of current population differences, but because parliamentary seats have remained frozen for decades.

Is this fair

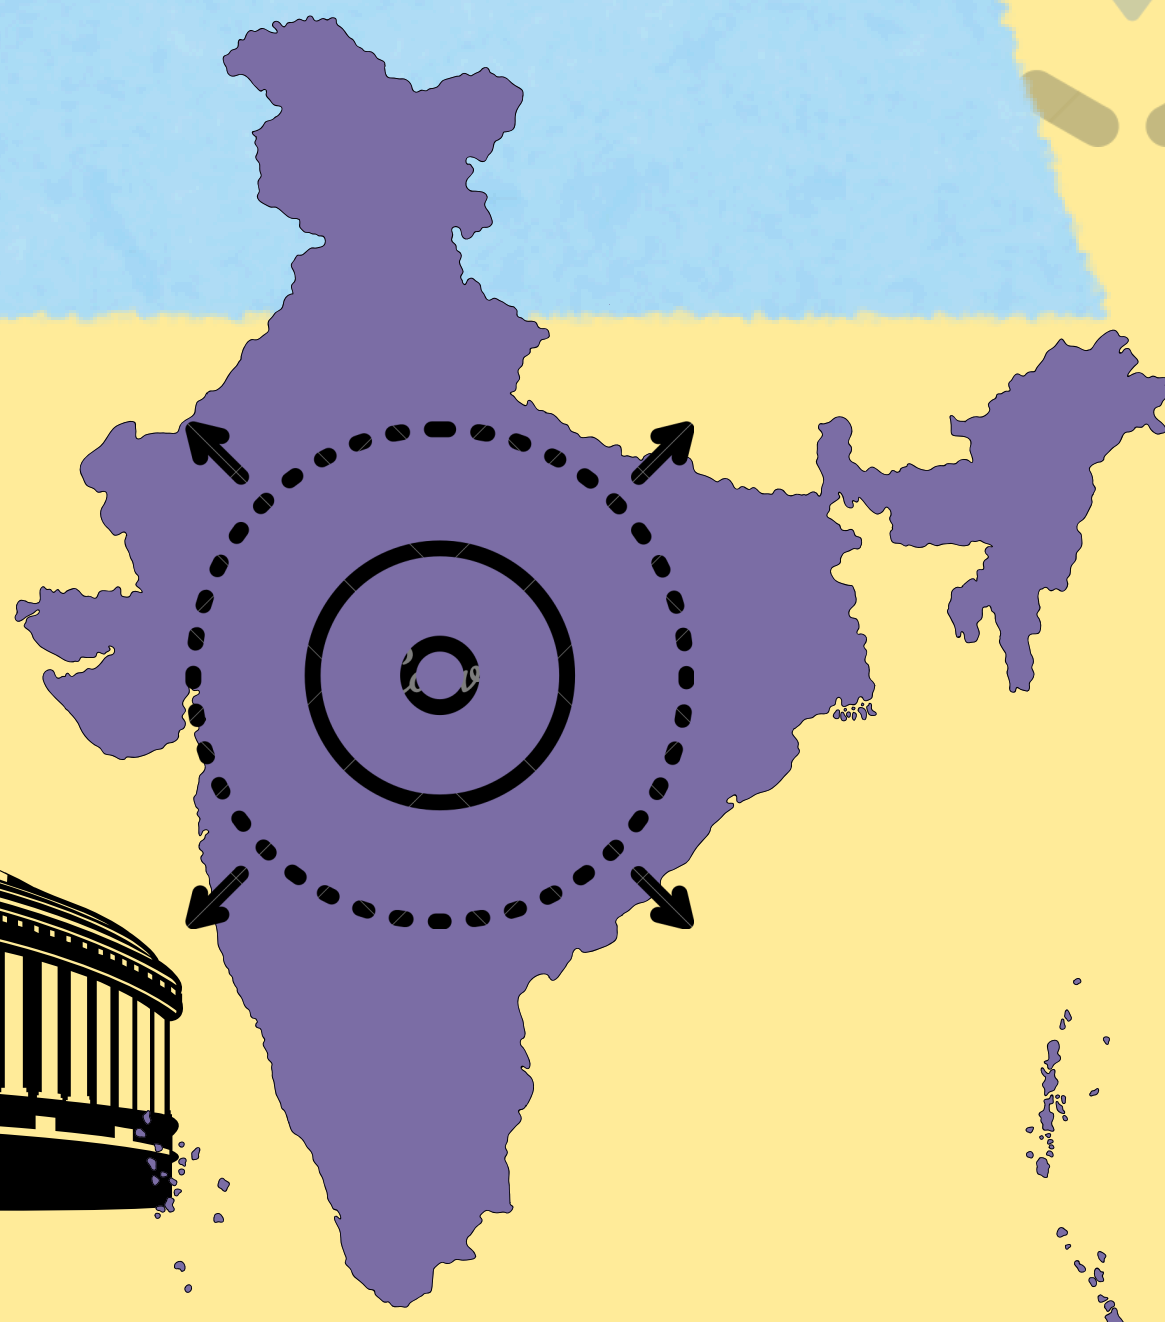

WHAT IS DELIMITATION?

Delimitation is the process of redrawing the boundaries of parliamentary and assembly constituencies and determining how many seats each state receives based on population.

Its goals are to:

- Ensure equal representation.
- Reflect demographic changes.
- Maintain fairness in elections.

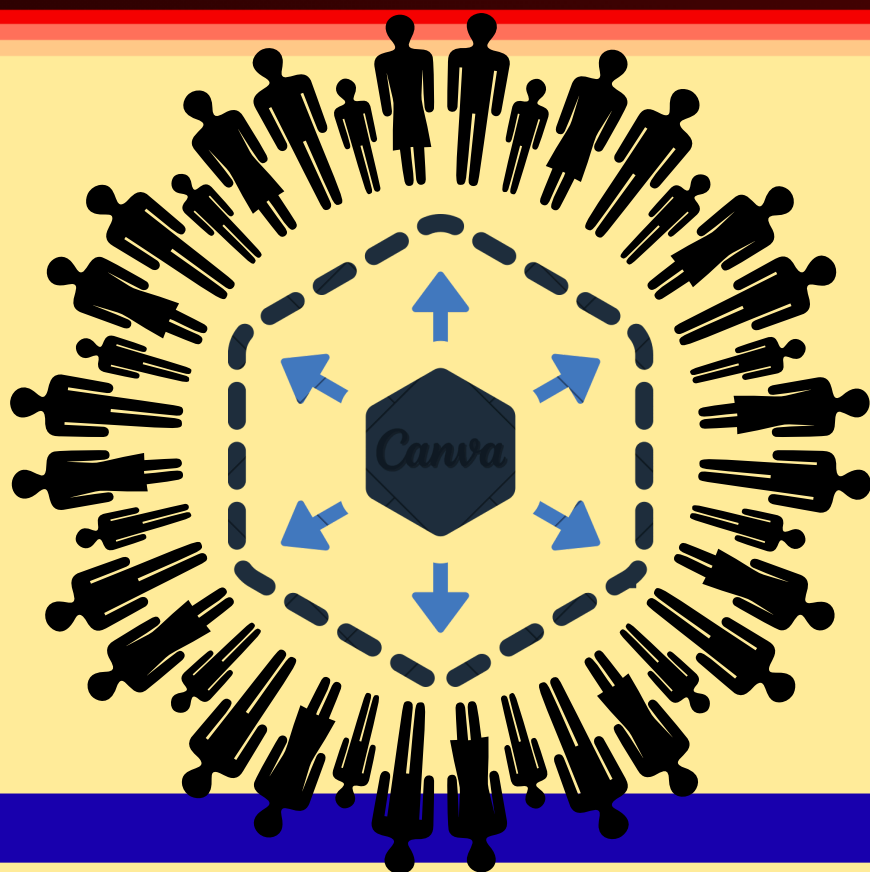

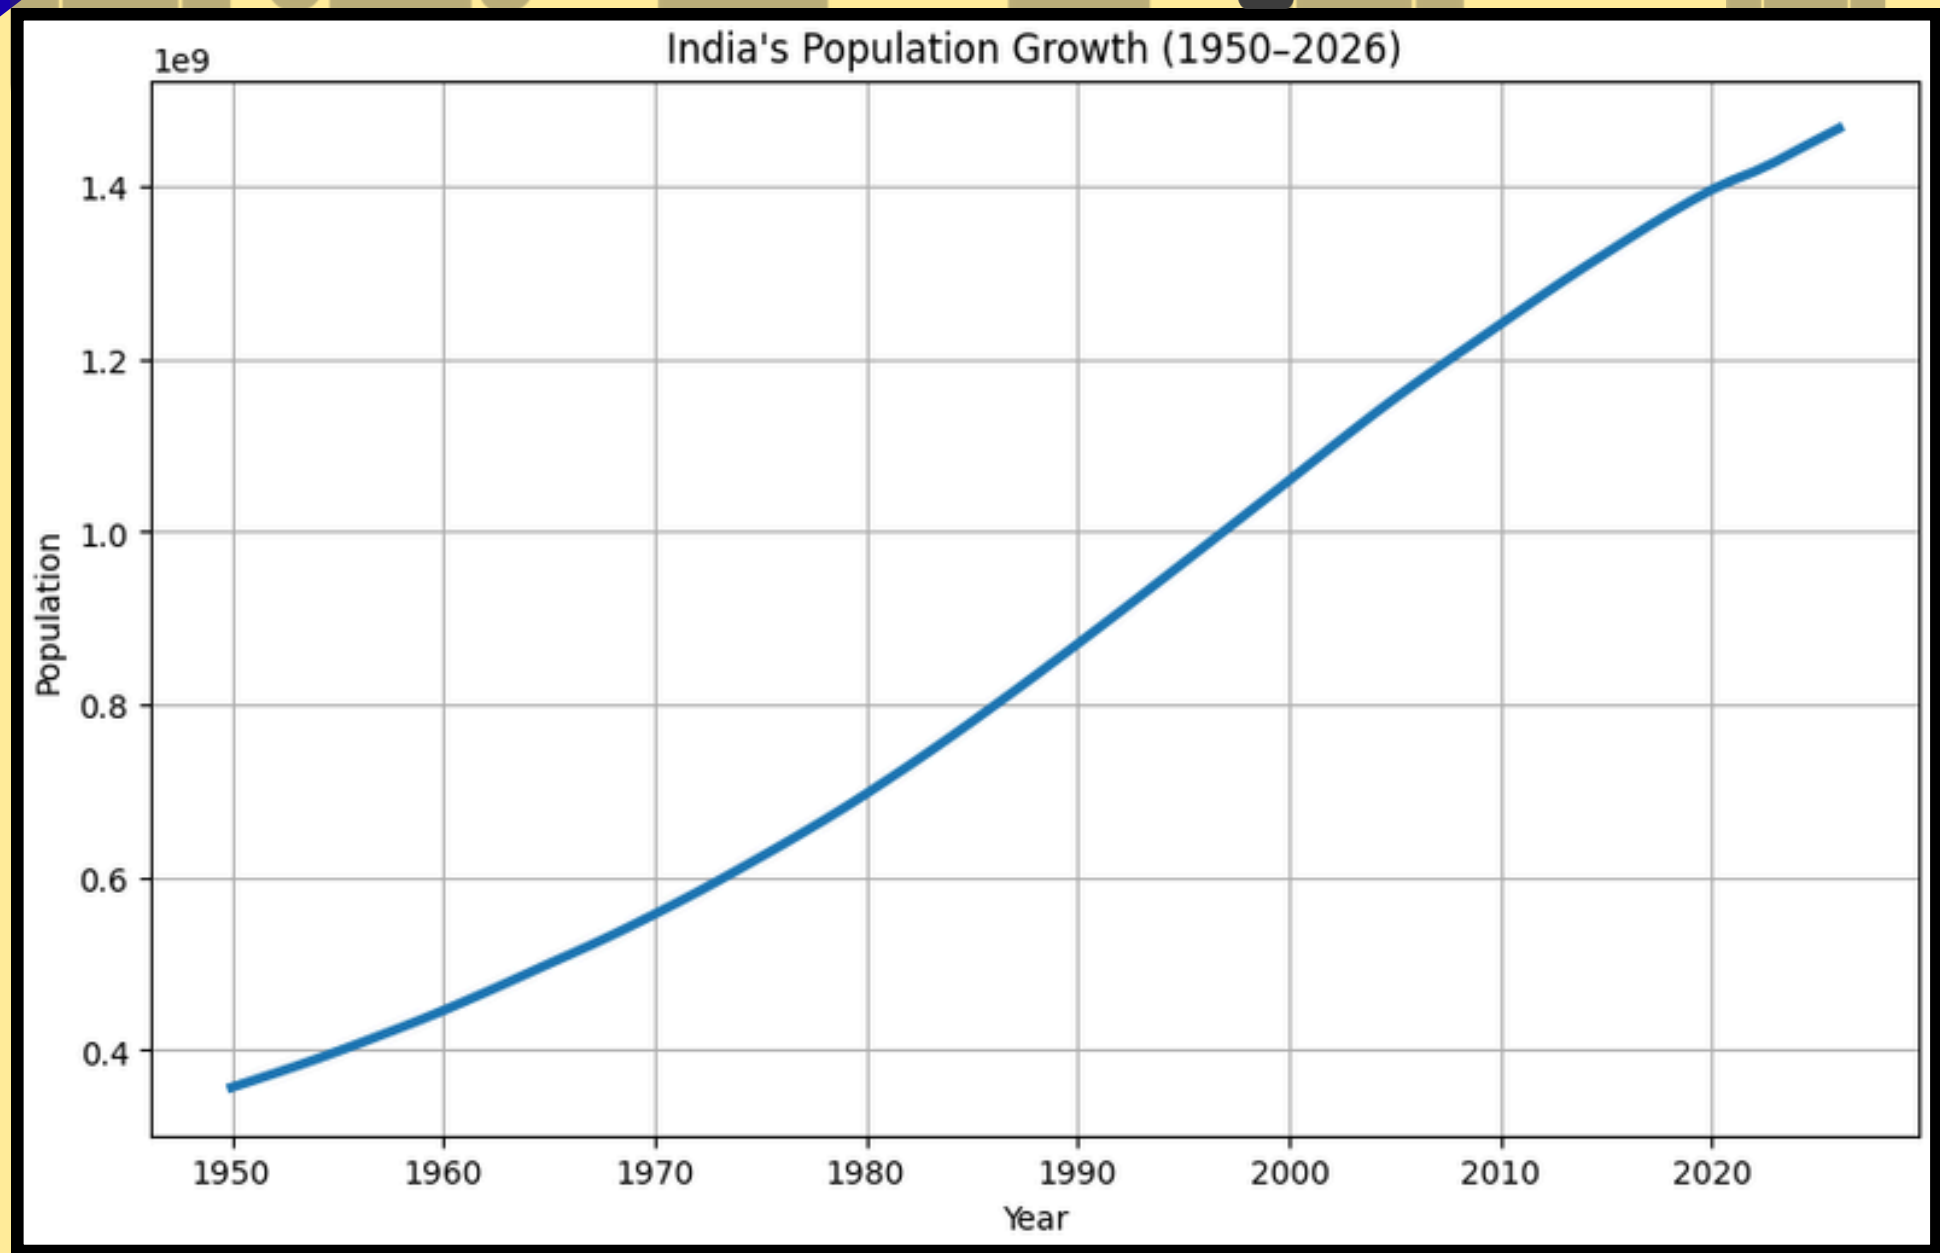

India's population has changed dramatically since the last nationwide allocation of Lok Sabha seats.

Some states have - grown rapidly,
become more urban,
experienced migration.

Others have - successfully controlled population growth,
seen slower demographic changes.
If seats never change, representation becomes unequal over time.

Southern states invested heavily in population control.
If seats are reallocated solely by population, states with faster population growth could gain more representation.

India's population has increased steadily over the past seven decades. Such demographic changes explain why discussions around delimitation and representation have gained prominence

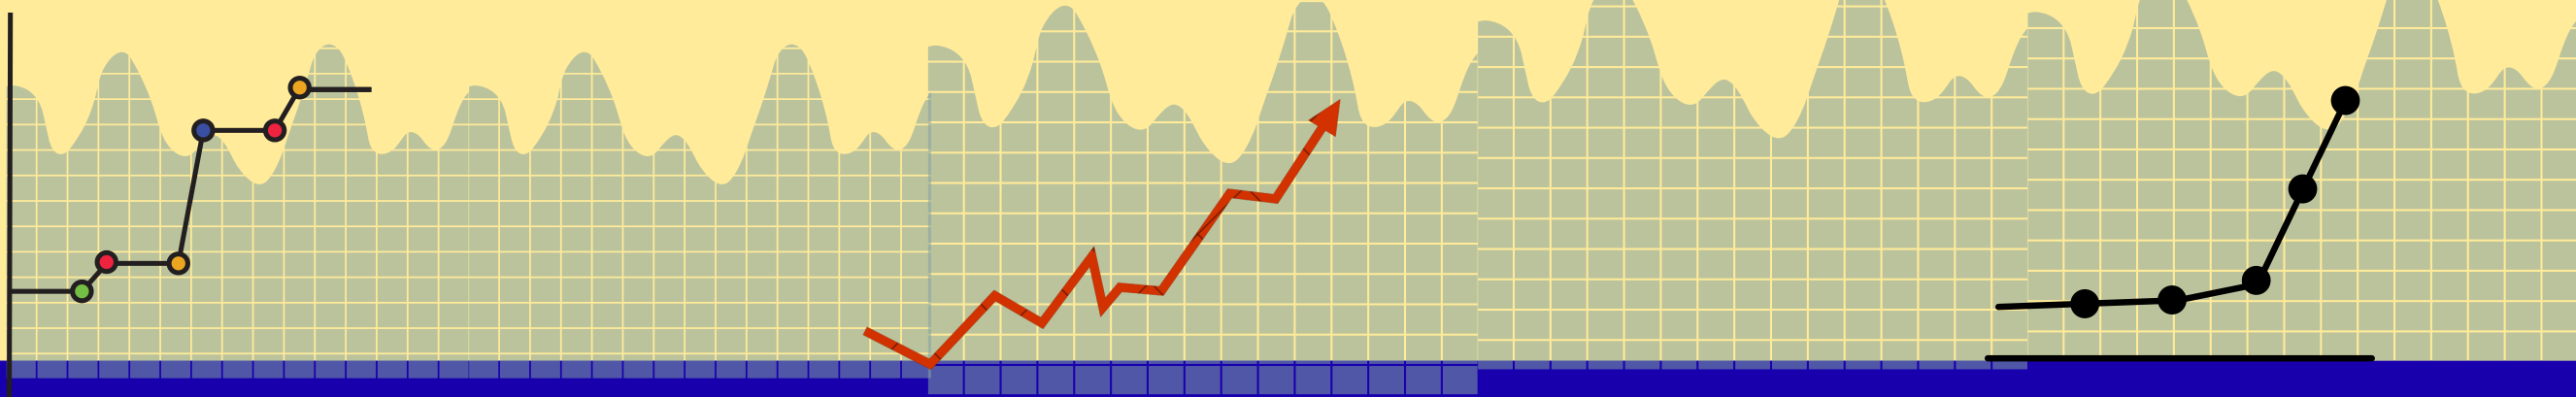

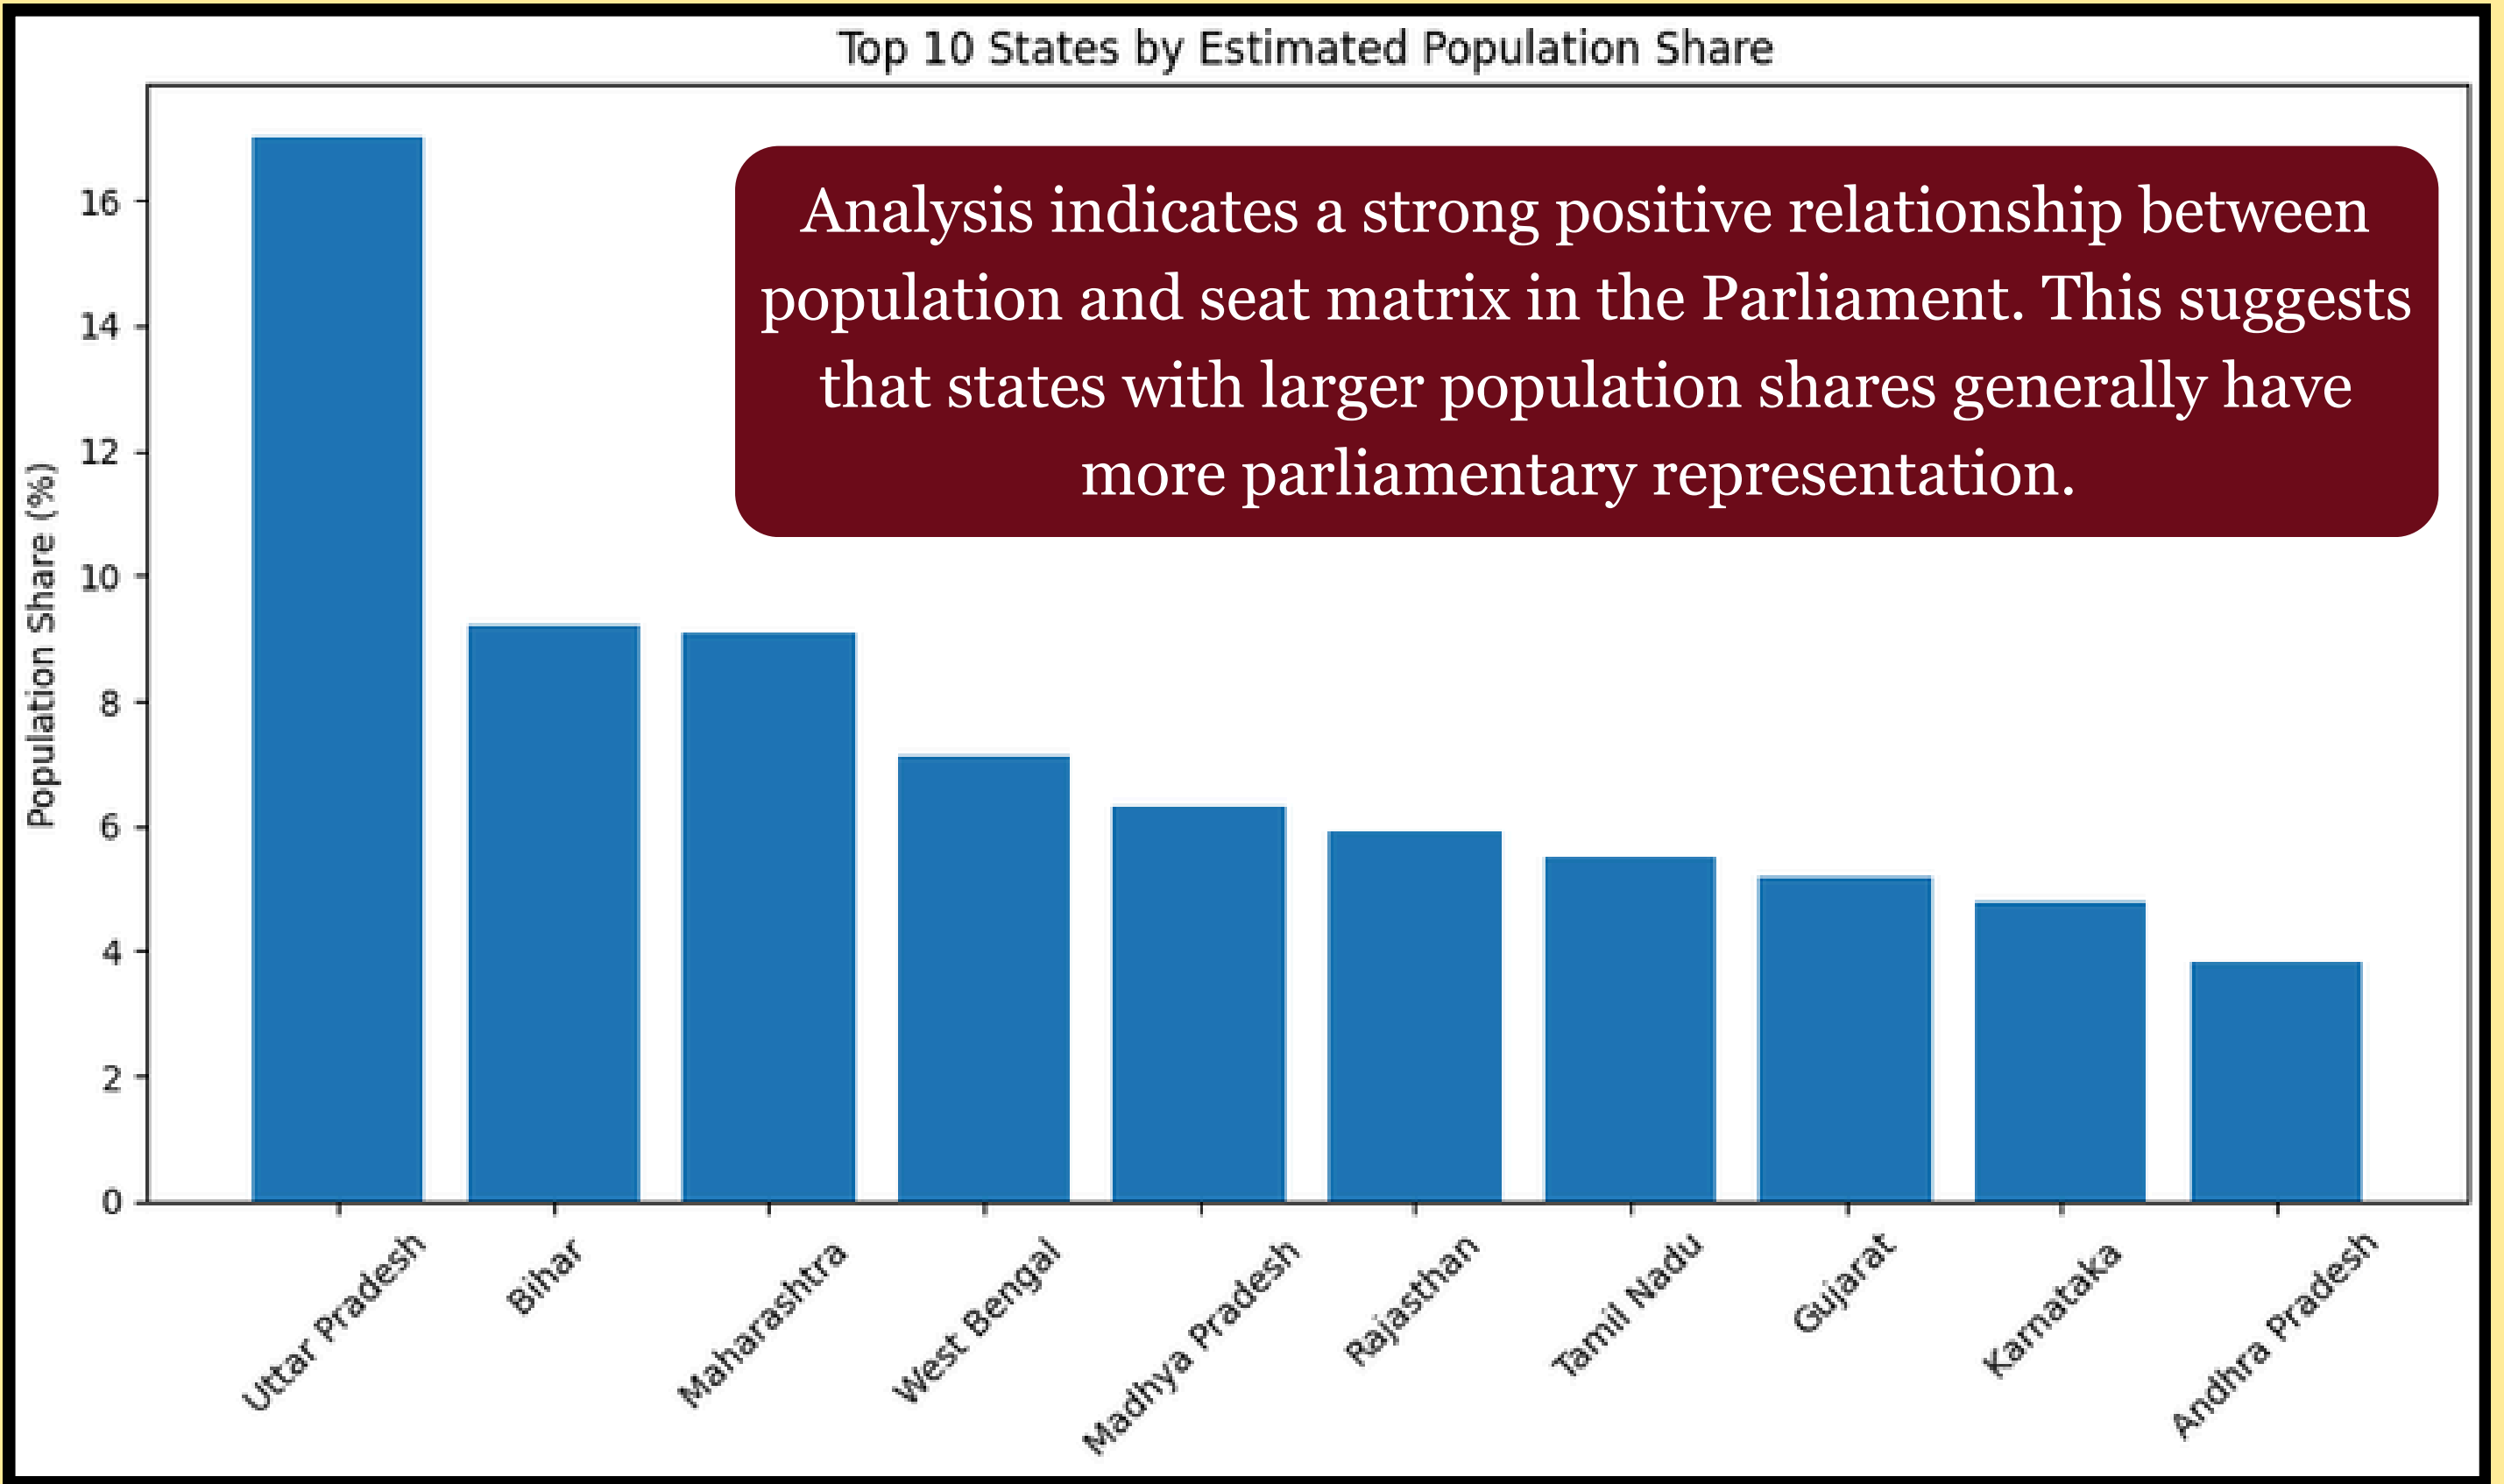

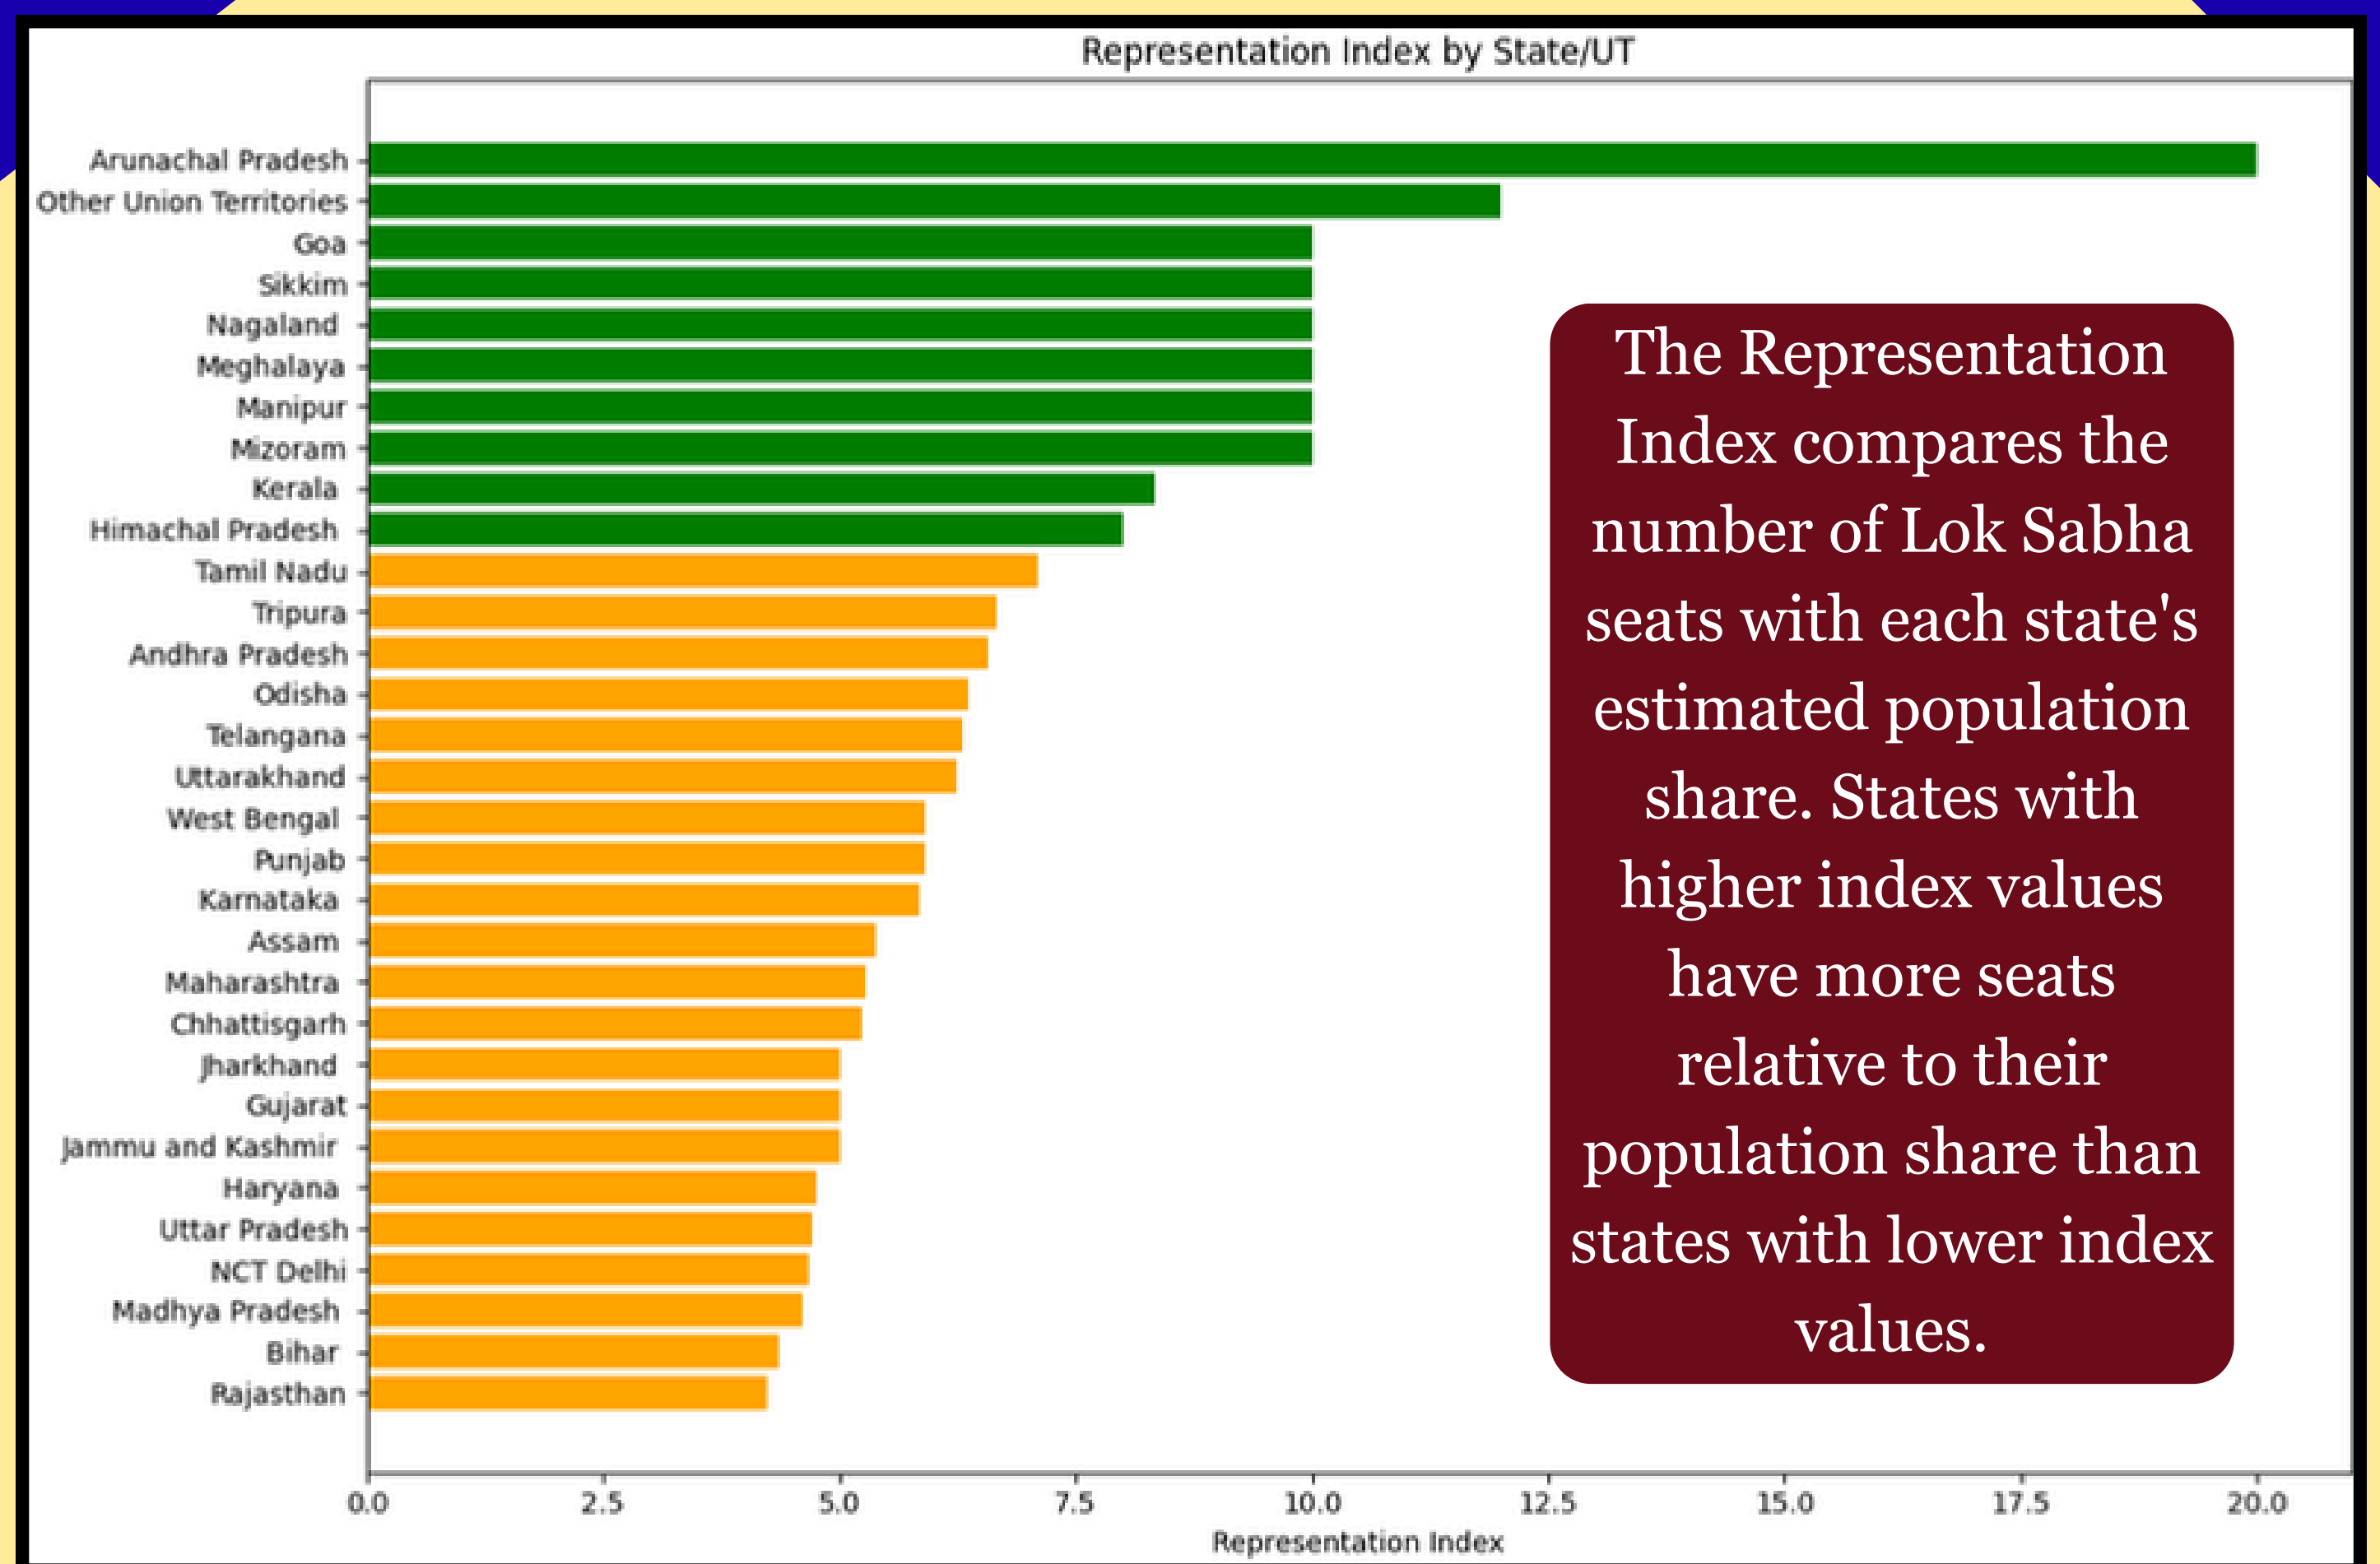

The Southern States have shown a lower population growth rate.

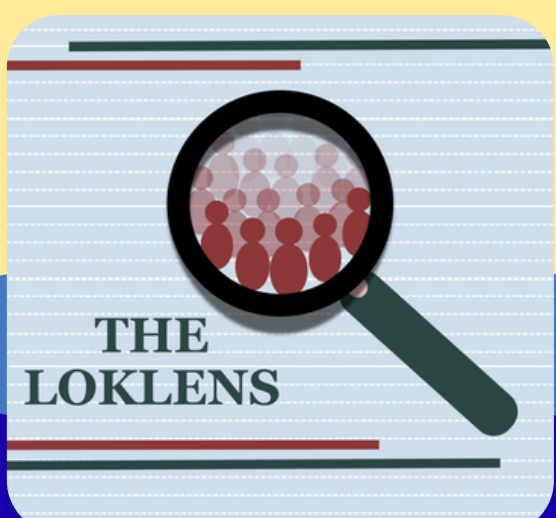

The distribution of Lok Sabha seats differs substantially across states. Larger states generally have more seats, reflecting their larger populations.

Demographic data reveals significant variance in population growth across Indian states over recent decades. While northern and central regions continue to expand rapidly, southern states have achieved a substantial decline in their population growth rates.

Under the upcoming delimitation exercises, southern states risk losing parliamentary seats in proportion to their population share. This shift creates a critical policy challenge, as it effectively penalizes states for successfully implementing national population control measures.

© 2026 The LokLens All rights reserved.

Content may not be reproduced or distributed without permission.

